

MADE FOR THIS

CAREER ACCELERATOR

RICHIE D

A letter to you

I want to tell you something it took me years to figure out.

I landed in Australia eight years ago with a no degree, a suitcase, and enough ambition to paper over how terrified I actually was. I'm stepping into a world where the culture was different. The references were different. The unspoken rules were different. I smiled through all of it and tried not to let anyone see that I had no idea how this place worked.

My first job was at a global food delivery company that was growing fast and hiring faster. Sales. My introverted bones nearly staged a revolt, but I needed the income and I needed a foothold, so I said yes and figured I would work out the rest later.

I did not work out the rest.

Weeks went by and I was barely hitting targets. The role felt wrong in the way that some shoes feel wrong: technically fine, functionally miserable. But I had nothing else, so I stayed and looked for a way to be useful.

Thankfully, before my contract was up, my mentor pulled me into a smaller startup. New environment, new energy. Same role. Still sales. I thought I had escaped. I was sorely mistaken.

The Finance and my Sales Manager were in the same room arguing about numbers again, the way they always did. Finance was pulling figures from a spreadsheet. My Sales Manager was pointing at his dashboard in HubSpot. Neither trusted the other. Neither could agree. And sitting there watching them, I realised something: the only system that connected every department, every lead, every deal, every dollar, was this CRM called HubSpot. And nobody was actually running it.

So I started learning it.

Honestly, I had a plan. Because I was desperate to get out of Sales, and the system was sitting there with nobody else willing to touch it.

What I found was not a sales tool. It was an engine. Email marketing, landing pages, automation, segmentation, reporting. The deeper I went, the more I understood that this was not software someone used occasionally. This was the operating system of the entire business. And it was completely unmanaged.

I started with something small. I built a nurture sequence, enrolled a few hundred leads, and watched it work. Showed my manager. He rolled it out to the whole team. Overnight I went from struggling sales rep to the person who built the thing that made everyone's numbers better. They called it Sales Enablement. This marked the beginning of my great escape.

That was the moment I understood something nobody had ever told me.

The CRM is the heart and brain of every business. Every lead, every deal, every customer, every dollar flows through it. And almost nobody knows how to run it. My next pay rise became a mission to rollout a global project. One global project turned into a career at a HubSpot agency. Four years later I am Head of HubSpot at a Diamond-tier agency in Australia, which sits in the top 1% of HubSpot partners globally. I went from Sales, to coordinator to specialist to project manager to team lead. I lived every single step of this path.

And now I look at Southeast Asia, at the VAs and the coordinators and the analysts and the Business Process Outsource (BPO) workers, and I see exactly who I was.

Capable, hungry, doing the work, and getting none of the credit for it.

I wrote this guide because you deserve to know what took me years to figure out.

You're already doing part of the job.

(you just don't know how to get more out of it)

Think about what you do every day.

You coordinate between teams. You follow up when things fall through the cracks.

You make sure the right information gets to the right person at the right time.

You hold the whole operation together while everyone else takes the credit.

That is not a support role, that is project management. And when it is attached to a system like HubSpot, the tool that Western companies are spending billions on and consistently failing to use, that role becomes one of the most valuable, most in-demand, hardest to fill seats in the market.

The problem is not your skills.

The problem is nobody showed you a better way.

What changes when you make the leap

BEFORE

- Executing tasks others decide.
- Invisible to the client.
- No clear career pathway.
- Paid like a support staff.
- $500 - $1,200/mth
- Wondering if you're enough.

AFTER

- Owning a system & outcome.
- Trusted, client facing project lead.
- In-demand career progression.
- Paid like a specialist.
- $3,500 - $4,800/mth
- Most valuable person in the organisation.

One skill set. One system. Up to 4x the income.

You were never behind.

(you were just never shown the pathway)

There are 1.5 million Filipinos alone working as virtual assistants for international clients.

That's 13% of every VA in the world. Add the coordinators, the analysts, the BPO workers across the Philippines, Indonesia, Vietnam, Malaysia.

That is an enormous amount of skill, sitting in roles that were never designed to contain it.

The work ethic is there and the education is there, and the adaptability that comes from growing up navigating systems and cultures and expectations that were never built for us, that is a genuine advantage. You already know how to read a room, how to manage expectations, and how to deliver something good even when the brief was completely wrong.

Western companies are scaling fast. They're buying HubSpot at record numbers. And they are desperately looking for someone who can own the system, manage the project, and speak directly to their clients offshore, reliably and with genuine specialisation.

They want exactly the kind of person you can become. They just haven't been able to find enough of them.

What this role actually is

A HubSpot Project Manager is not a button-clicker. They are the strategic lead on every account they touch.

They understand the client's business objectives before they open the portal.

They set the agenda, they drive the conversation, and they don't let the client make decisions they'll regret.

They run kickoff calls that establish authority from minute one. They build customer journey maps that reveal how a business actually sells.

They architect the HubSpot system to automate what's manual and give management insights they've never had before.

“

Strategy is a cohesive response to an important challenge. That is what a great PM delivers, every single week.

Every step of this path is teachable

(I know, because I've walked through every one of them)

3 things you need to understand

(before anything else)

1 HubSpot is learnable. You do not need a tech background.

I had never heard of HubSpot when I started. I wasn't a developer or a marketer. I was a bad salesperson who just needed somewhere to be useful. The portal is intuitive, the logic makes sense, and the learning curve is manageable, especially when you're being taught by someone who does it every single day at the highest level.

2 The technical skill is only half. Authority is the other half.

Knowing how to build a workflow won't make you irreplaceable, but knowing how to walk into a client call, set the agenda, and make them feel like they're in the best possible hands, that is what makes you irreplaceable. And both of those things are teachable, which is the whole point of this.

3 You are already closer than you think.

If you've ever coordinated a project, tracked tasks, or stopped something from falling through the cracks, you've already been doing fragments of this job. You just didn't know it had a name, a title, and a premium salary attached to it.

What employers are actually looking for

(And what separates the ones who get hired from the ones who get ignored)

I hire for this role. I have been hiring for this role for years, and I can tell you with complete certainty that the gap between a good candidate and a great one has almost nothing to do with how many certifications they have.

It has everything to do with how they think, how they communicate, and whether they walk into a room and take ownership or wait to be told what to do.

→ They own the outcome, not just the task

A great PM does not wait for the client to tell them what to do next. They come to every call with an agenda, they know exactly where the project stands, and they are already thinking two steps ahead. When something goes wrong, and it always does, they come with a solution, not just a problem. Clients do not want to manage their project manager. They want to hand it over and trust that it gets done.

→ They can hold authority in a client conversation

This is the skill most people underestimate. Being technically strong matters, but if you cannot command the room you will always be pushed around. A great PM sets the tone from the first call. They are warm, they are direct, and they make it very clear who is driving. Clients feel safer when someone is confidently in charge, and that confidence is something you build, and something this course specifically trains.

They understand the business, not just the tool.

Anyone can learn to click buttons in HubSpot. What separates a specialist from a PM is the ability to look at a client's business and immediately understand what they actually need, what is slowing them down, where the money is being lost, and what a good outcome looks like in six months. That business-level thinking is what every agency and every in-house team is desperately searching for.

They communicate like a professional, not a support resource.

The emails you write, the way you structure an update, the way you handle a difficult client conversation, all of it signals whether you are someone who belongs at the table or someone who works behind the scenes. A great PM writes with clarity and authority. They say what needs to be said and they move things forward.

You will not be able to recognise yourself

(and that is not an exaggeration)

I remember the first client call where I realised something had shifted.

The client asked me something complex and strategic, and instead of feeling like I needed to look it up or check with someone, I just answered it.

Clearly.

Confidently.

Like I had been doing this for years. That was the moment I knew.

By the end of this course, that is where you will be.

Not performing confidence. Actually having it, because you will have earned it.

What that moment actually feels like

 You walk into an interview and genuinely stand out.

Most candidates applying for HubSpot PM roles have done a Udemy course and watched some YouTube videos. You will have spent two months inside a real portal, working through real scenarios, coached by someone who does this at the highest level every single day. That difference is obvious to the people hiring you.

 You feel like a peer, not a support resource.

There is a moment that happens, and I have watched it happen with every person I have brought into this world, where they stop deferring and start leading. When a client says something wrong, you correct it. When a project is drifting, you bring it back. That shift from support resource to trusted expert is what this course is designed to create.

 You can handle conversations you never imagined you could handle.

Scope creep. Difficult stakeholders. A client who thinks they know better. A project running over time. These used to feel like situations where you had no power. After this course you will know exactly how to handle each one, because you will have seen how a working PM at a Diamond-tier agency handles them, in real time, with real clients.

 Agencies and recruiters come looking for you.

Top students who complete this course will be considered directly for roles at agencies I work with, or connected to recruiters who have built relationships with hundreds of HubSpot agencies worldwide. You will not be sending cold applications into the void. You will have a warm, credible path into a market that is actively looking for people like you.

How this course works

(Everything I know, transferred to you as fast as possible)

I designed this course the way I wished someone had designed something for me when I was starting out.

No padding, no filler, no content that exists just to make the course look longer than it is.

Every class has a purpose and every week builds on the last.

Lecture

Concepts, frameworks, and the real-world thinking behind every decision. This is where I show you how I actually approach the work.

Practical

Hands-on work inside a real HubSpot portal. You apply what you learned, get feedback, and leave each class knowing you can actually do this.

What you cover across 8 weeks

HubSpot Technical Skills

- The CRM data model and how everything connects
- Contacts, companies, deals and proper setup
- Pipelines, stages and lifecycle management
- Workflows, automation and logic building
- Reporting, dashboards and what managers look at
- Data hygiene, imports and portal auditing

Project Management Philosophy

- What a HubSpot PM actually does day to day
- The full project flow from kickoff to close
- Running client calls and establishing authority
- Customer journey mapping and scoping
- Managing difficult clients and tough conversations
- How to position yourself and land the role

By the end of eight weeks you will have gone from never opening HubSpot to being able to run a full client project end to end.

That is the promise.

The next batch is forming

(And there is only one thing left to decide)

Every person in this course is someone who decided not to stay where they were.

They are ambitious, career-driven, and serious about building something real for themselves.

That is the environment you will be stepping into, and it matters more than people realise. When you are surrounded by people who want to grow, you grow faster.

The next batch has limited spots because that is by design. Small groups mean real feedback, real coaching, and real accountability. This is not a course where you disappear into a platform and watch videos alone.

It is live, it is interactive, and it is built to actually move you forward.

What joining actually gets you

 Eight weeks of live, structured training.

Two classes a week, lecture plus practical. Real portal access. Real feedback from someone who does this professionally every day.

 A cohort of people who are serious about the same thing.

You will not be doing this alone. The people around you will push you, and you will push them. That dynamic matters far more than most people expect.

 A direct path into the industry.

Top graduates will be considered for roles at agencies I work with directly, or connected to recruiters who have relationships with hundreds of HubSpot agencies worldwide. You will not be figuring out how to break in on your own.

 The confidence to actually do the job.

Not just the knowledge. The real, practical, I-have-done-this-before confidence that makes the difference between getting hired and getting overlooked.

I build this because I see myself in you
(and I see exactly who I was)

Capable, worldly, educated, hungry, and underleveraged.

I'm not teaching this from the outside looking in. I am the ICP, just further down the road. I stumbled into HubSpot because I was desperate.

I learned it because I had no other choice. And it changed everything: the title, the income, the way clients looked at me, and the way I looked at myself.

I'm not here to sell you a dream. I'm here to show you something real that I do every single day, at the highest level, and to tell you that the gap between where you are now and where this path starts is smaller than anyone has ever told you.

The seat has been empty for years.

Companies are paying for software they can't properly use, hiring people who can't deliver on it, and quietly waiting for someone like you to walk through the door.

“

You were ~~never behind.~~ You were just never shown the door.

You are Made For This, and I mean that.
